Madison Day, on the Union, the Constitution: And the Enforcement of the Laws, at Odd Fellows Hall, New Orleans, October 12th, 1860 Mr. President and Fellow Citizens: I could have wished that the pleasing duty of addressing you on this occasion had devolved on another - one who, by the power of his reasoning, the beauty of his diction, and the charm of his eloquence, would reap golden and ever blooming laurels in the noble and patriotic cause in which you are engaged - one who could roll away the misty vapors of sectional discord from the loftiest peaks of our mountains and open up to view the pleasing and enchanting prospect of one whole and common country smiling beneath the glorious influence of the Union, the Constitution, and the Enforcement of the Laws. In the performance, however, of the duty assigned me, you must not expect an ambitious parade, an ostentatious display, a gaudy exhibition, or a wandering o'er arid fields in fancied flights to cull a flower, to collect a gem, or to embellish and adorn - for the cause of truth and justice, like beauty, needs not the aid of fiction and ornament, for it stands upon its own merits and the primary interest of society, and deriving its effulgent light from the radiations of Heaven. In all ages of the world leagues and governments have been formed for the best and for the worst of purposes.
